BOOK DESCRIPTION

A star fell into the loch. A creature came out of it.

Argyll, 1644.

The night the star falls, Sorcha MacEwen is the only soul in her township who goes down to the shore.

Widowed for ten years, she has spent her days tending the sick, delivering babies and laying out the dead. She knows what happens to women who heal too well.

And she knows what the minister says about lights that fall from heaven.

But the creature in the shallows is still breathing.

From a distance, he looks like a man. Up close, he's something else entirely. A demon? The Devil himself? She should leave him be. But when he catches her wrist, he looks at her as if she's the last thing standing between him and the dark.

So she drags him home.

He doesn't speak her language. Her medicine nearly kills him. And every time she touches him, silver-gold light spills beneath his skin.

She should be terrified of him. Instead, she can't stop looking at him.

The longer she shelters her impossible stranger, the harder it becomes to imagine letting him go.

But secrets are dangerous in a Highland township, especially for a woman who lives alone.

And Sorcha is beginning to suspect that whatever fell from the stars was never meant to be gentle.
