BOOK DESCRIPTION

They told her she was too much. Too soft. Too curved. Too costly to keep. The orcs disagreed.

Delia Harrowmere has spent her whole life being measured and found wanting—by a family that sold her to settle a debt, by a kingdom that decided her body was something to apologize for. Chained in a debt caravan bound for a frontier that kills the women it swallows, she's stopped expecting anything but cold.

Then a mountain storm cracks the night open, and she runs.

She chooses the monsters of the Iron Wilds over the certain death behind her.

What finds her in the snow isn't a monster at all. Ralvar Stonefang is seven feet of scarred green muscle, a war captain who looks at her like she's something to be guarded instead of owned. He offers her fire. Food. A choice she's never been given.

And the way he looks at every curve she was taught to hide makes her forget how to breathe.

But the men who paid for her are already at the gates.
